The caveat here is that there are a number of different energy functions being used in Rosetta, and there isn't necessarily any consistency in the numbers which are output by them. I don't have evidence for it, but I personally suspect that even within a single energy function you'll have slightly different conversion factors between different ...

Rosetta reports energies in Rosetta Energy Units. I know it's a trite answer but it's true. Some components of the scorefunction (derived from molecular mechanics) produce scores in kcal/mol. Other components produce scores weighted to be in the same range, but not tied to particular units. If you want to call them a physical unit, then ...
